"FIVE DAYS IN A WESTERN SADDLE"

A Lady Rider's Impressions of the Trail Ride of 1935. —

by Germaine Kellermann

As he pointed to a thin spiral of smoke rising from the valley below, our French-Indian guide looked at us from under his ten gallon hat, amused — but not unsympathetic — while we shifted uneasily from one side of the saddle to the other, our bodies rather bruised (for most of us had not ridden in years) but our souls uplifted by the beauty of the scenes we had just traversed.

Permeated with forest fragrance and our brains stamped with crowding impressions (later to be revelled in at leisure) of dazzling glaciers, green valleys, bright flowers, glistening brooks, rushing torrents, great dark forests, jade lakes, shifting clouds and deep blue skies... we were, with the rays of the setting sun slanting through the tall spruce, reaching the end of a twenty-five mile trail, the first leg of a five-day ride covering eighty miles through the Canadian Rockies.

In order to keep pace with the expense of issuing these bulletins, members who have not yet paid their annual dues for the year 1935 are requested to send their cheques to J. M. Gibbon, Secretary Treasurer, Room 324, Windsor Station, Montreal, Canada.

Riding down from Harrison Lake

Early that morning we had left Banff enveloped in chilly mountain mist. At noon as, with the sun high and warm, we were following the charming Cascade Valley, we were surprised to see, in the near distance, blue smoke gently drifting up. We knew that where there is camp fire smoke, there usually is tea.

We had overtaken the advance guard of the party, which was already dismounted and resting. The last ones soon joined us.

"The Trail Riders of the Canadian Rockies" were forty strong, ranging in ages from sixteen to sixty, and nearly half being women. It was at once obvious and interesting that this group was made up of persons and personalities from all over the world and from different paths of life. Congeniality and mutual advantage were assured as these people, while sympathizing in their common yearning for the great open spaces, must bring to each other different points of view.

I became aware, as we gathered closer around the tea-kettle and conversation began to run more freely, that several had been on this trip before: it seems that once having beheld the grandeur of the Canadian Rockies, one must go back again and again.

Some, already sufficiently tired, would have willingly lingered in this pleasant spot, but camp had to be reached before dark.

Leaping into the saddle, our young leader gave the signal to move on. This hardened, though charming, rider from Philadelphia, for all but his somewhat Eastern elegance, might have been a native of the "wild and wooly West":— his colorful shirt, generously fringed and embroidered doeskin coat, and his intriguing silver ornaments gave a picturesque Western touch to the landscape. Other men and women in the party also wore Western attire, such as large hats, shapes of leather, bear or goatskin over their jeans, bright kerchiefs and embroidered belts, all of which blended delightfully with the scenery. In fact we formed, I thought, a most attractive picture as, with more or less agility, we "sprang" on our horses and merrily cantered off.

Occasionally, the wind brought strains of songs and guitar. Wilf Carter, our yodling cowboy, was closing in the cavalcade and encouraging the stragglers with tales of the mountains and the prairie:—"Oh! only eleven more months and three more days in the caboose..."

I'll never forget what a privilege it was to have that excellent artist among us. What would all his radio friends not give to hear him, as we did, in his real setting, around the camp fire or on the trail, mounted on his favorite horse, with his big black hat set just at the right angle and his faithful guitar slung over his shoulder! "I like the prairie", I overheard him to say, "cause I can see where to get out!"

But in time everything happens, and so Windy Camp suddenly came into view.

I have seldom seen such a romantic spot, such as it was revealed to me in the rosy glow of the setting sun. Nestling in the valley below us, surrounded on all sides by tall blue mountains, were a dozen tepees already set up, and several big fires burning. A silvery river wound its course by the camp.

As we approached, we saw much activity going on. Our cowboys were already at work, cutting fire wood and gathering spruce boughs for the beds.

As I dismounted, my horse neighed with joy at the thought of freedom. I tottered to the cook tent and was glad to take my dinner standing. I never was so hungry nor did anything ever taste so good.

When at last all the ravenous appetites were appeased, we felt an infinite sense of peace invading us... Falling in with our mood, our Camp Troubadour picked up his guitar and we gathered round the camp fire listening to his soothing voice and tales of the West. Meanwhile, the moon flooded the surrounding mountains with silvery light. Freshly made doughnuts and chocolate were passed around, and a spontaneous cheer soon went up in gratitude for Bert, the cook. But the night air was growing decidedly colder and gradually the big camp fire became deserted in favor of the cosy tepee and the bed of spruce boughs.

I had never slept on boughs, and found them most comfortable. There is a technique, though, to the way they are laid down: the cut branch should be set down to the ground, the tip of the next branch covering it so that no sharp point is visible, only the soft needles showing at the surface; the boughs should be very close together and in several layers.

A great deal of laughing and joking always went on in the ladies' tents, most of them never having "roughed it" before. Let it be said, to the credit of our sex, that I did not hear a single complaint, and yet some of the ladies were actually grandmothers! Although I never knew such alert and young spirited grandmothers; they might well serve as examples to many young girls of my acquaintance.

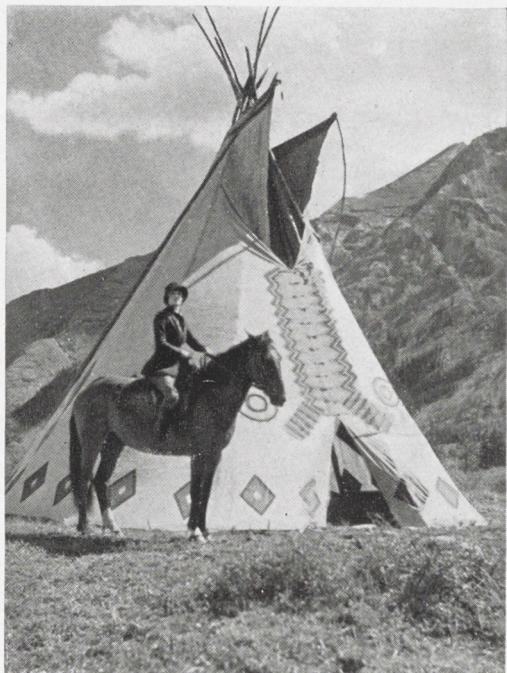

The next morning I was up with the dawn, and I surprised my tent mates by lighting a fire in our tepee; I had learned from the guide how to split a log into shavings for kindling.

Already the horses were being rounded up. This is a big job as they wander miles off in search of grass, and the cowboys must sometimes ride for hours to find them.

Soon coffee was ready, also delicious trout which some of the Riders (my blessings upon them) had caught the night before in Harrison lake, a short ride from the camp.

While we were having breakfast, a whole flock of wild mountain sheep came down the mountain with their lambs to look us over. They ate salt out of our hands and payed us several visits that day, for we did not move camp, but made various excursions to the surrounding country.

It was on one of these trips that we saw our first bull-moose, standing in swampy ground. As we stood still, fascinated, the great beast made no attempt to run away, but watched up a long time, much intrigued by our presence, then slowly and reluctantly moved away.

The third morning was all hustle and bustle. We got up in a hail storm and had a rare "al fresco" breakfast: coffee and cream of wheat were generously flavored with hail stones; as to Bert's inimitable flap-jacks (he made 400 daily), they were "à la mode" this morning.

That third day was a good test for our endurance and character for it hailed and rained steadily a great part of the day, a cold penetrating rain, with a strong, icy wind. It was hard to imagine at that moment our friends, back in New York, prostrated with heat, so much is human appreciation tempered by present circumstances.

We must have a looked like the remains of Napoleon's Grand Army retreating through the Alps as, with bowed heads, and wrapped in great water-proof coats, we silently started out, steadily climbing in the direction of Snow Creek Pass, to an altitude of 7,300 ft.

But a summer storm in the Rockies never lasts very long; a ray of sunshine at last broke through and, as by a mighty sleight of hand, the dead forest changed into a bright flower garden. Such an orgy of colors! It would take a botanist to name the many varieties of flowers that grace these mountains. There are some, however, that grow in such profusion that everyone knows them, such as the Indian paint brush that comes in yellow and white as well as all the gradations of red. The violet-rose fire-weed, so called because it grows most abundantly in the regions that have been burned by fire. Imagine a whole valley (for the scale is large in this country) so densely covered by this flower that it is a solid mass of this intense and brilliant color! Or a mountain side thickly carpeted with white and pink heather, then a meadow of golden arnica or of multicolored poppies, or again the exquisite and compact mixture, on the peaks, of mountain-pink and of rich deep blue forget-me-nots, a hue only to be found at high altitudes.

From this Garden of Eden we descended into the Red Deer Valley. The trail was long and steep and I now realized how high we must have been.

As a relief to this monotony, the tinkling of bells was heard in the distance, then much shouting and commotion: it was the pack-train which had overtaken us. "Make way for the pack-horses!", about twenty of them, for we expect to find our bedding and dinner ready at the next camp. Bert leads this Flying Squadron of the Pots and Pans like a general, escorted by his two lieutenants, dignified dispensers of the rations. I wonder if these boys realize their absolute importance: they are the pivot around which revolve our hopes, not to say our very lives. Abjectly, therefore, we hang over a precipice or even dismount and crouch under branches, or go into the slush to our knees to give them the right of way, fearful of delaying them one instant. Like gods, they pass on, accompanied by our silent prayers. For any of us may get lost, that is only of relative importance, but anything happening to the Cook Boys would be of inconceivable consequence!

One unconsciously picks out one's own camp gear, as it flies by, and wonders if that bottle of iodine has broken yet and dyed the spare piece of underwear in which it is carefully wrapped.

The cowboys close in the train, usually driving before them, with much vociferation and spectacular display of horsemanship, some lazy member of this helter-skelter, hurry-scurry cavalcade.

Down the slushy, slippery trail we go, into the very bowels of the earth, it seems. Alas you never come down but that you must go up again: this is one disconcerting truth, regarding mountain traveling, which everyone finds out before very long. Tensing one's sore knees not to slide down on the horse's neck, one muses:—"What is the use of going down?" In my dark moments, I would console myself by thinking it would be a great deal worse the next week when I was scheduled to join the Sky Line Trail Hike, with only two legs to depend on.

But even this endless trail finishes, suddenly opening into a charming green valley in the hollow of which nestles a comfortable looking log cabin. It is Scotch Cabin, and, with it, the first sign of human life since we left Banff. A sturdy young ranger hurries out to meet us. He invites us to dry ourselves by his stove. We completely invade the place and make ourselves thoroughly at home. We are sitting on top of the furniture, on top of each other. The last-come don't even get a look in. We have "a spot" of lunch and tea while steaming out. Fortunately Wilf Carter is in: stifled sounds of guitar are coming through to me. Presently I feel the need of space and fresh air. As I come out, two others squeeze in, subway fashion.

The Red Deer river, which we must ford, is, we hear, swift and high, but the Ranger reassures us by offering to help us across. He looks so strong and able that even the more timid souls must be comforted.

The experience is thrilling. One has the impression of being carried away by the torrent. The horses are truly wonderful: they hardly need any spurring. They cautiously feel the slippery boulders and lean against the current. The water is up to their shoulders and, to avoid getting wet, the rider must pull up his legs and stay on top of the horse as best he can. Thankful again am I for the Western saddle.

The pack horses rush and splash through this boiling torrent. What luck that my bedding bag is water-proof, for it went right under!

The next camp site is at Red Deer Falls and more lovely, if possible, than the last. This great body of water rushes through narrow canyons with a continuous roar that fascinates.

To-night, somehow, the pack containing the knives, forks and spoons was delayed on the road. Nevertheless, when Bert at last roared the familiar "Come and get it", we came running with our usual enthusiasm. It was corned beef hash and cabbage, only peas could have been worse. Forks or no forks, we did not hesitate very long. Some made chop sticks, others preferred pieces of flat wood but most of us, reverting to the customs of our ancestors, found it most expedient to use our hands. It was fun watching each other and a very good thing that we could not see ourselves!

It is surprising in reality how simple life can be when purged of all the complications brought on by civilization; a canvas over your head (and that only when it rains) good food and a wholesome appetite is all that you need. I thoroughly enjoyed my meals sitting on a rock, with fragrant wild flowers growing all around me in lieu of a table bouquet; the sparkling mountain brook gurgling at my feet supplied the dinner music, while the great and ever changing spectacle of the setting sun surpassed any entertainment.

The fourth day was even more glorious, the trip having been carefully planned so that the scenes increased in grandeur each day. And now to describe the beauty of this day's ride, I find myself short of adjectives, having already used them all at the beginning...

With intermittent views at the start of the Douglasses, Cyclone and Mt. Drummond, we ascended rapidly between Oyster Peak and Mount Skoki, soon finding ourselves above timber line, among dazzling glaciers and lakes of jade glistening like jewels in their settings of dark mountains. These glaciers looked so near that it seemed as though we could easily walk to them. Heights and distances, however, are deceiving in this vast country and in such clear and rarified atmosphere. It is appalling to think that a glacier which looks but 10 ft. deep is in reality 100 ft. and that it takes all day to cover what seems to be but one mile.

We pitched camp that night among lacy larches, their delicate design outstanding against the moonlit sky.

The nights were cold, as also sometimes the days, and I hope I am not shocking anyone when I say that I did not take off my clothes for five days, but rather added on at night all that I had brought with me. I left New York on a sweltering hot day and simply could not make up my mind to pack enough woollens: the mere feel of them sickened me. Who could, on the 19th of July in New York conceive of ice and snow! To those who might contemplate a camping trip in the Canadian Rockies, let me here advocate a feather sleeping bag, and then let it hail!

With the dawn of the fifth and last day, one wondered how nature could keep up the scale of beauty already set up, as it was truly impossible at that time to imagine scenery more stupendous than we had seen the previous day. But it was there, waiting for us! A perfect wonderland the whole day through, starting with Baker Lake and Baker Creek Valley, until at last we reached the highlight of the trip and beheld Mounts Victoria, Temple and Hungabee, blanketed in glittering snow, with their great glaciers hanging on black precipitous ramparts. In front of this splendor, an indescribable feeling of utter personal insignificance pervaded me.

Subdued, we followed the shores of Ptarmigan lake and envied those who could fix on canvas its incredible colors and reflections, although these mountains must be at once the inspiration and the despair of artists, so elusive and eternally changing are their moods.

Reluctantly did we leave this magnificence to start on the steep and long descent down Redoubt mountain towards the picturesque and swift Corral Creek, scene of the final Pow-Wow and entertainment.

I wonder if, upon reaching Lake Louise station and the Banff motor road, others felt, as I did, the jarring of civilization...

Abruptly, it seemed, the Ride had come to an end. I gave my horse a last pat and hurriedly said good-bye to my friends; it did not seem possible that most of these people, who had so much in common, would never meet again, if only to talk over these golden days...

AN AMERICAN COUSIN

The American Forestry Association which organized three years ago the "Trail Riders of the Wilderness" on the lines of our own "Trail Riders of the Canadian Rockies," has conducted six expeditions on horseback up to date, four of which were into the Flathead-Sun River Wilderness in Montana; one into the Wind River Mountains in Wyoming, and one into the Gila Wilderness in New Mexico. Five expeditions are planned for this Summer. Riding experience is required, and the parties are limited in number—three to twenty-five members, and two to twenty. The rates vary according to the trip from $95. to $150.—a deposit of $25. being required on each reservation. Riders must provide their own sleeping bags. Riders must be or become members of the American Forestry Association ($4. a year). The Secretary is Ovid Butler, The American Forestry Association, 1713 K Street, Northwest, Washington, D.C.

We are happy to extend fraternal greetings to the Trail Riders of the Wilderness.

HORSES I HAVE KNOWN

By Frederick NIVEN

There have been too many famous horses in the world to get them all into one round-up, famous horses both in the flesh and in paint, bronze, stone, verse, prose. Bucephalus, the horse that Alexander the Great rode into India; the horses of Achilles; the too-magnificent charger of General Prim (in Regnault's picture that visitors to the Luxembourg may recall); the horses of Boadicea's chariot rearing up on Westminster Bridge as though startled by the passage of some top-heavy lumbering London County Council tramcar; Dick Turpin's horse, Black Bess; the horses that brought the good news with onomatopoeic hoof-fall, thus, "I galloped, Dirck galloped, we galloped all three"; the horse with the Lavender Eye, which was a horse on a merry-go-round: to mention these is only to make a scrambling beginning.

My own first horse was a rocking one. He lived in the attics' corridor of a house in Glasgow. His name was Charley, after a horse ridden by George Catlin, one of my boyhood's heroes. Another personally memorable horse—more recent in my life—was a cayuse behind which I rode once up Tegart's Pass in the Rockies. To see him, at some place where canted trees made a dubious letter A over the trail, joggling a little this way to slip the pack upon one side through, joggling a little the other way to slip the other through, and then with a snort of satisfaction striding on, was to realise he had intelligence.

His solicitude for the safety of the load was remarkable. Not but what, one day, his intelligence was otherwise manifest. Weary of the burden he walked into the woods and bucked and rubbed it off against low branches. The annoyance of the packer (Walter Nixon) was dispelled when, gathering up the parfleched boxes strewn over the scene, and looking into them, he found that not an egg was broken. Some packing! Some packer!

But I must tell you about Baldy, whether you believe me or not. We were companions on many a long trail, but he seemed, on the first day I rode him (on my way to the Lake of the Hanging Glaciers in the Selkirks), to be a practical joker. He found amusement in stepping abruptly off the trail when he saw a stump near-by on which, by his side-stepping so, I might stub a toe.

Once or twice, in fact, I had evidence that he had a gay notion to crack my knee-cap on a tree trunk. Suddenly, in the late afternoon of that first day out, when I was wondering how long I should be affable over his fun, he found himself in a cloud of wasps, the horse ahead having planted a hoof in their nest. After the performance of some thrilling gyrations on the brink of the canyon he obeyed my orders to be still and let me dismount and, with my sleeve clutched down over my wrist, sweep the demented and dementing wasps off him. After that his attitude to me was entirely changed. His chief aim in life (even ahead of eating blueberries) was to see, moving clear of obstructions without any guidance from me, that I did not crack a knee or stub a toe.

I can almost hear the throat-clearing of the incredulous, but there are those who will not doubt my veracity in the matter—such, for example, I think (should he happen to read this article), as Mr. Tschiffely, he who rode two criollos, the South American relatives of the North American cayuses, from Argentine to Washington, ten thousand miles, and told of his experiences, in Southern Cross to Pole Star. In fact, I fancy he will have stories to cap that one of mine.

So, also, I surmise, were he still alive to read these lines, would that great horseman, Cunningham Graham. Sir John Lavery's equestrian portrait of him, by the way, is surely specially noteworthy for the effect of movement in conveys. One has the impression that, if one looked away from it for a moment, on looking back, horse and rider would be gone beyond the frame, leaving only the background of the empty pampas.

Sometimes these cayuses I have mentioned come to melancholy ends. During the last years, in the grassy secluded valleys among the eastern foothills of the Selkirk Mountains, there has been much rounding-up of the wild herds, driving of them down to corrals by the railway tracks, and shipping of them away to become tinned meat in France and Belgium. Ticklish work it is and often dangerous, and that not only because of the abrupt ups and downs of the country and the wild stampedes, the right-about turns on hillsides, the sudden crashings through belts of woods.

I know of one young man who, helping to round up a bunch, had a snorted warning from a stallion, and, ignoring it, was grabbed by the challenging beast and hauled bodily from the saddle. The stallion had to be shot and left there for the coyotes to devour. In these herds driven in from the ranges are often such fine beasts that horse-fanciers watch for their coming, and frequently, for but a dollar or two more than the price paid by the canned-horse contractors, gain possession of an animal that, carefully broken to bit and saddle, may be their favourite mount.

And just recently, in the Nicola Valley of the British Columbia, the Indians—to raise a sum of money to pay for the fighting of a dismal case for them in the courts—have been rounding up horses and selling them at seven dollars each (about thirty shillings) for dog-feed and feed on fox-farms.

Talking of Indians reminds me of the horse, the performing horse, that Buffalo Bill presented to Sitting Bull after that chief had toured with him through the States and Canada (Sitting Bull never went to Europe) in his Wild West Show. From brass bands and the arena he went to one of the Sioux reservations in Dakota—Standing Rock—where he was greatly prized by Sitting Bull. Then came the day—it was during the Ghost Dance trouble of 1890-91—when the Government ordered that Sitting Bull was to be arrested. It is common belief that it was hoped by the powers that were that he would resist arrest. It is common belief that ways of arresting him less likely to create disturbance, less likely to be resisted than the one finally ordered, were vetoed by the powers that were, in the hope that he would resist and thus give opportunity to get that unbroken chief out of the way.

Be that as it may, a few moments after Sitting Bull had come out of his cabin in answer to the summons, shooting began. There was the crack of a rifle—another—and volleys of firing followed. Suddenly, from a corral nearby, came galloping into that arena the horse that Buffalo Bill had presented to his Indian friend, and as the old unbeaten chief fell, there, among the fusilades, the horse sat down on his haunches, raised a foreleg and waved it at the audience, raised the other and saluted, and bowed and bowed again—and wondered, perhaps, why the usual ovation of clapping hands and laughter was absent.

Then there was the horse that... but I must rein in, I see. Horses, horses! One could fill a book with them.
